Project Title:	The governance of migration-related diversity in Chinese cities
Abstract:	Short description of your achievements or relevant information For this project we are looking for a PhD candidate to comparatively examine the governance of migration-related diversity in Chinese cities. Chinese cities have been significantly shaped by internal (rural-urban) and external migration in the past decades, spurred by economic development and urbanization. This has changed the composition of urban populations, making them more diverse and raising all kinds of questions relating to the participation and inclusion of immigrants in housing markets, the education system, the labor market, and the social, religious and cultural life in cities as well as to the relations within immigrant communities and between immigrants and established residents. While much research exists on the demographic developments surrounding migration in China, pointing out the shift from single to family-based migration (Fan 200) as well as the growth of China's floating population of temporary migrations (Fan 2005), less studies have focused on the governance responses to such migration. We know that the colonial heritage (Yeoh 1996) and the Hukou system (Huang et al 2010) provide an important institutional context for dealing with migration-related diversity in cities, but there is limited engagement with the role of municipal governments, civil society organisations and businesses in responding to and dealing with the presence of immigrants. Such research is also lacking, as we do know that immigrants increasingly do claim their rights and represent their interests in Chinese cities (Chan 2019, Kathiravelu 2019, Ye 2016). This research will thus address the question: How do Chinese cities govern migration-related diversity? How do they react to and accommodate claims-making of immigrants in cities? The project will be part of a broader research program on cities of migration, which currently focuses on cities in Europe and in India, and seeks to expand to a global level. This includes East-Asian cities (China, Japan, Indonesia), African cities, and N/S-American Cities. Candidates for this project will be expected to work within a team, so that insights from studies of cities in different parts of the world can

	be integrated in one theoretical narrative on cities of migration. There will be some flexibility to define the specific aspect of the urban governance of diversity that the project will be focusing on based on individual interests. The PhD researcher will carry out comparative research of Chinese cities governance of migration and diversity. The project will be embedded in the Governance of Migration and Diversity group at the Department of Public Administration and Sociology, where it will complement to the broader research project on cities of migration in Europe. This includes potential comparisons between Chinese and European cities of migration.
